1. On the morning of 4 July 1951, four artillery pieces of a hitherto unobserved type were loaded at the Dallgow-Doeberitz railroad station. They had solid wheels with pneumatic tires, a protective shield bulging forward, no muzzle brake, a split-tail carriage whose cross-section was U-shaped and 150-mm to 180-mm. The guns had arrived from the north gate of Altes Lager, were towed by trucks, [redacted] and escorted by soldiers who wore red-bordered black epaulets with artillery insignia. Six other trucks loaded with the artillery pieces [redacted]

2. Troops began to leave the hutment in the Olympisches Dorf-Elstal area on 12 July. The 48 low wooden barracks, including 10 supply and classroom buildings, of the camp had been occupied by personnel who wore red-bordered black epaulets with tank insignia. Two courses of instruction had been conducted there, the first having been a course for enlisted personnel of undetermined strength and the second an officer training course of allegedly 700 trainees. The two groups were loaded on three trains on a spur track near the Loewen Kaserne during the night of 12, 13 and 16 July. Rumors among the local population said that the trains left for Neuruppin and Grossen (O 53/W 00) on the Oder River. A German loading worker stated that two more trains with furniture and coal followed the three aforementioned trains. All 120 German employees in the hutment were discharged. **
